LaserCam Takes on Bursitis

"I had bursitis in my right hip," says Carolyn, a retired college athletic director. "It gave me trouble every time I got up and it would take a minute before my hip would respond."

Traditional medicine offers very little for patients with bursitis. If ice doesn't help, anti-inflammatory medications or cortizone injections are often prescribed.

"I tried a treatment called Prolotherapy," says Carolyn. "It worked for a while but the treatments became less and less effective as time went on."

When Carolyn began a new exercise program, she realized how little strength she had in her hip. "One of the exercises required that I lift my leg, while seated, and rotate it in circles. My left leg was fine but when I went to lift my right leg, I could not even get it off the floor." She mentioned this to her doctor who recognized the relationship between the nerves involved, the vertebrae, and believe it or not - the teeth!

"My doctor found what he called an 'interference field' associated with one of my teeth. The tooth had never bothered me but he explained about interference fields. . . sometimes symptoms are in a distant area."

An interference field, as described in Dr. Crosby's new book, Beyond Pills, Knives and Needles, is a disturbance in the body's energetic field. Areas of disturbance can cause local or distant symptoms. In Carolyn's case, the problem was a crowned molar.

This time, treatment was laser fast and non-invasive. Carolyn's doctor had a new device called a LaserCam. Treatment took ten seconds. "Immediately after the treatment, I moved to the edge of my chair and easily lifted my right leg off the floor. I could even rotate it in circles. Another surprise came when I went to get up. My hip responded perfectly." Carolyn has had no symptoms since the second treatment. According to Beyond, Pills, Knives and Needles, that is a typical response when you find the primary interference field.

Ask Dr. Crosby

Is it true that each tooth has a relationship with other parts of the body?

Yes. It's called the odontosomatic relationship. Dr. Robert Kidd refers to it as the Dental-Acupuncture relationship.* Each tooth is correlated to an acupuncture meridian and to specific organs and tissues. Teeth can accurately pinpoint (and cause) problems in the rest of the body. You can read more in Dr. Kidd's book.
