Life after Chemotherapy--with CAMS Technology

In 2002, at the age of 53, Nicole Beggs began six months of chemo-therapy followed by 30 days of radiation for aggressive breast cancer. She describes the devastating side effects:

"I developed permanent heart damage. My joints became severely arthritic, requiring thumb fusions and two total knee replacements. The slow bowel peristalsis from nerve damage caused severe constipation requiring daily laxatives; by afternoon the abdominal bloating restricted my breathing and I looked eight months pregnant. Yet, the most severe symptom was the relentless fatigue. Everything became a real effort. I went to bed each evening by 6 or 7:00 p.m. and had no interest in socialization. I lived in despair thinking this nightmare would last the rest of my life."

Nicole was treated by a progressive physician who attempted many traditional and alternative therapies, including daily vitamin and human growth hormone injections, with little result. Then she began to pay attention to a local veterinarian who was treating animals with a CAMS unit.

"I witnessed a veterinarian reverse one-sided paralysis from a spinal stroke. The dog could not stand at all and had no bowel control, but with CAMS therapy it became a happy, lively, running dog with total control.

I was astonished and I purchased a CAMS unit. That's when I began to make a slow recovery; it was 2011. Then in 2013, I was asked to participate in the RJV telomere study. I was faithful and treated myself every day. After two years, my telomere numbers had dramatically improved BUT the real wonder was that I could honestly say I was alive again and enjoying life!"

Nicole believes her energy is normal for a 65-year-old and the pain from arthritis is gone. She has started to participate in some of her favorite activities again and she is able to enjoy a full day.

"It feels good to be alive again!" reports Nicole. "I have no other explanation for the incredible results I have experienced. I am sincerely grateful for the minds of great men. They are our saving grace."

Nicole is happy to discuss her recovery:
