CAMS Technology for Thyroid Imbalance

A number of months ago, a physician practicing in Canada shared an interesting case history with me:

A 23-year-old patient presented with excessive hair loss, nose bleeds, extreme fatigue, and post partum depression. All symptoms had occurred since the birth of her first child, four months previously. Blood tests indicated a thyroid imbalance. But the interesting thing about this case was that the woman had had an episiotomy with the delivery of her baby. The astute doctor recognized that thyroid and episiotomy scar were issues in the midline of the body. Careful evaluation revealed an interference field at each location. Both areas of disturbance were treated with a TensCam; the doctor also recommended several dietary corrections. During a second visit two weeks later, the patient reported mild vaginal pain (reminiscent of delivery pain) for two days following the treatment--then her symptoms began to subside. Within 2 months (4-6 treatments) all symptoms completely resolved. Blood tests verified that the thyroid had stabilized. At the time the doctor shared this case history with me, I pondered the prevalence of episiotomies and thyroid imbalance among women. I wondered if there might be a larger-scale connection. Since then I have seen two similar cases of Hashimoto's thyroiditis where the women had episiotomies. Both cases resolved with CAMS treatment to the vaginal area and thyroid. I share this, not because three cases are proof of anything, but because they represent an interesting area for exploration. It is well known that scars are one of the best known locations of interference fields--especially scars resulting from surgical procedures performed during periods of emotional stress. The birth of a child is an obvious time of emotional stress. The likelihood for an episiotomy scar to develop into an interference field is high and should be considered in more cases than just with thyroid imbalance.

Ask Dr. Crosby

Can I use the CAMS devices with my present therapy?

Yes, CAMS technology works by a much different mechanism than conventional therapies. There is no cross reaction or interference. In most cases, they work synergistically.
